The U.S. government has been laser-focused on painting the recent violence in Syria as just a transitional period between the current protests and the "clear and present danger" that is the Assad regime. This argument has been extremely popular among government officials and the general public, and is based on a transparent attempt to mislead the public. Last week, the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, wrote a report — "Key Points in the U.S. Government's Proposed Syrian Transition Plan" — that cited the administration's lengthy "framing process" of the Syrian conflict: As [Obama] has noted, Syria presents a 'clear and present danger' to US security, in large part because of the country's connections to terrorist groups including Al-Qaeda, its use as a venue for exporting instability to other countries, and its key role in the region's economy and energy. The violent turmoil in Syria is destabilizing the Middle East and North Africa, a region that hosts vital US and regional interests, while the Syrian regime is using the struggle to suppress protests and crack down on dissent. The report goes on to say that, by providing aid to the Syrian rebels, Obama is trying to improve the situation in Syria and weaken the country's government: "The Obama administration has long focused on helping promote a transition of power in Syria that can improve the lives of the country's population," the report reads. As Obama alluded to in his State of the Union, the administration is currently preparing a request for "a limited number of military advisors" to help
