And it looks like many of the problems that led to their demise still linger. A new buyer is needed as the Michigan Department of Transportation (MDOT) looks to right its ship after the difficult summer and fall of 2013, in which it was hit with a more-than-$41-million federal fine for failing to complete a $2.4 billion project, a structure that industry experts say is past its 'sell-by' date. The 2013 debacle, which was caused by MDOT's contracting private companies to do public work instead of using employees, led to the just recently-announced sale of the road-building division. "All of this was allowed to happen because the state wasn't managing contracts in a timely manner, and that cost taxpayers more than $14 million, and more than $41 million in fines by the feds," says Ann Arbor based labor consultant Mike Clark. "The best course of action should have been to do all of this work in house." Clark, though, thinks MDOT's effort to overhaul its department is a good one, and a necessary one. The Department of Transportation has suffered years of understaffing,
